

Teachers – New for 2007-2008

Now there's an even easier way to use The Tennessean in your classroom!

Through Newspaper In Education, you can receive an electronic edition of The Tennessean. It's visually identical to the print edition, except that it is accessible from any computer with Internet access and it has great interactive features.

Because today's students are engaged with interactive, electronic media – like video games, cell phones and mp3 players – the electronic version of The Tennessean makes a great learning tool. Like the print copy of the newspaper, the electronic version is also perfect for honing your students' reading skills, sharpening their critical thinking abilities and increasing their civic and global awareness.

The electronic version enables you to:

- Flip through and skim headlines
- Customize the screen layout to your preferences
- Search for articles on a particular subject quickly and easily
- Save, e-mail and print specific articles at the click of a mouse
- Download specific pages of the newspaper

Teachers are accessing this tool in various ways. Here are some options:

- Have your students access it individually or in groups on computers in your classroom, computer lab, and/or media center.
- Project the electronic edition from your computer onto the smart board or white board in your classroom using a projector.
- Project the electronic edition from your computer onto the TV in your room.

Check out a sample electronic edition on the Newspaper In Education website at www.tennessean.com/nie. Click on the ad at the top of the homepage of our site. To order, complete the form on the back of this sheet.

Remember:

- Research indicates that students in schools with NIE programs perform 10% better on standardized tests than students in schools with no NIE.
- Using the newspaper achieves multiple State Performance Indicators.

If you have any questions, please contact Melissa Spradlin at 615-259-8032 or mspradlin@tennessean.com.